Tritt, of the college's psychology department, Hugo Luscher, faculty member from the Eidgenossliche Technische Hochschule in Switzerland, and nine students will be taking part in the College's newly developed interdepartmental course, "Summer Program in Cross Cultural Psychology."

Health Authority Calls For National Pollution Policy

Lack of a "national materials policy" that contains comprehensive guidelines for environmental control and resource conservation is hampering our efforts to conserve resources and protect the environment in the United States, according to an environmental health authority.

Dr. George Kupchik, program director and professor of environmental health science at Hunter College, New York City, says that a national materials policy was recommended by the Resource Recovery Act of 1970. "Unfortunately we hear little of the implementation of this document," he said.

"I would hope that we might soon develop a national policy that would spell out what we want to do, how to conserve our resources, how to collect and process the materials we want to recycle, what incentives and subsidies are needed to encourage recycling, and how to reclaim our other wastes, whether as compost or landfill or as a fuel for energy," Kupchik said in a recent interview.

He added that, "Until we have a national materials policy, it is grossly unfair to condemn any one material or group of products as being responsible for the solid waste problem."

The problems of solid waste are complicated, Kupchik said, by the absence of a "health perspective," which has led to confusion on topics such as the recycling of wastes.

"People tend to think of solid waste as a relatively clean and simple material that anyone can collect and store and manage as he will," Kupchik said, "but in reality waste is a potentially hazardous material."

"Not only are there real problems with injuries—cuts and punctures from broken glass and exploding aerosol cans, but there is the problem of disease," Kupchik said. Garbage is not an inert pile of sand or gravel. It contains organic material which decomposes, causes offensive odors, breeds flies and feeds and harbors rats. It provides a tremendous potential for the spread of all kinds of insect and rodent borne diseases."

Just as the public is unaware of the hazards of handling waste materials, it is unaware of the purpose of many of the products being discarded as waste, he asserted.

"Sanitation has become so much second nature in our society that we have forgotten why we insist on it. Food packaging, for example, was designed primarily to keep and store foods and beverages in a sanitary manner. If the consumer were more conscious of this health benefit, he would not be so quick to disclaim the use of certain products and materials."

He said the history of the preventive health movement has revolved around serious efforts to eliminate those items that carry infections from individual to individual. Consumers should be more conscious of the health benefits such "single service" items as the paper or plastic cup and plate provide, the environmental health expert said.

"Way back when, every public place had its common drinking cup or glass. You drank from a cup everybody shared, and quite often you shared a variety of diseases from the harmful germs deposited on the cup. The same was true of the common towel," he said.

"For years, public health people fought against use of the common cup and towel. It was only with the advent of single-use items that the battle began to turn in the favor. Even today nobody regards these sanitary food service articles more favorably than the health officer and sanitarian."

Dr. Kupchik said many environmental activists do not understand the necessity for such products in terms of the public health. Among the recommendations for saving the environment, he said, one urging abandonment of paper towels in favor of the "good old rag."

"When I hear consumers being told they can help lighten the waste load by using rag to clean up, washing and using it over again, I become somewhat exasperated," Kupchik said. "I think of the cost of the 'good old rag' the consumer in time and effort, and what the cost would be to other resources such as power and water if everybody started using washing rags. Most of all, I think of the cost in sanitation and preventive health, because rags can be disease carriers. Return to rags or to other notorious germ-carrying objects is a lot more serious than adding a paper and paper cup, or other single-use disposable item to our waste load."

He cited two recommendations of the 1971 National Conference on Food Production, which was held under the auspices of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and the American Public Health Association. The conference recommended that government agencies officially establish consumer advisory councils, and that a massive program of consumer education be developed to protect the public with information about food protection and food service sanitation.

"It seems to me that an appropriate program of consumer education and enlightened consumer involvement can result in widespread appreciation of preventive health practices and a reduction on the part of the consumer to trade his well-being for a simplistic solution to the complex solid waste problem."
